THE LATEST

Psychology Today

Aggression in Twentysomethings' Relationships

A number of studies show that cohabiting couples are more likely to experience physical aggression in their relationships than married couples. Two studies shed light on this subject by exploring how aggression in the relationships of individuals (mostly) in their 20s is associated with various commitment dynamics.

NEWS YOU CAN USE

We've always known that relationships are important.

But just how important they are was not apparent until Search Institute analyzed research on more than 5 million youth and interviewed hundreds of young people from different backgrounds and settings about important relationships in their lives. What they've discovered is summarized in their new research--Relationships First: Creating

10 Things You May Not Know about Teen Dating Violence

While one in three women and one in four men will experience violence from their partners in their lifetimes, one in three teens will experience sexual or physical abuse or threats from a partner in one year. In an effort to help raise awareness, here are ten facts from loveisrespect, Break the Cycle, and 1in6.org that show why it is important to promote healthy relationships for all young adults.

TOOLS YOU CAN USE

Beyond Sex Ed: How to Talk to Teens about Love

Should educators and parents be talking about love more with the teens and pre-teens in their lives? Could they do more to help students navigate some of the more bewildering emotions of adolescence? Is love really something kids want to talk about? If it's not being talked about in school, where are kids and teens getting ideas about love and relationships? Phyllis Fagell, a school counselor in Washington, D.C., who is a licensed clinical professional counselor and the mother of two teens (and an elementary-schooler) answers these questions.
